

Diversity in housing

Your front-page story on "tiny living spaces" was like a ray of hope. The charity-lottery system of providing affordable housing isn't filling the gap in our housing stock.

We can balance income and housing needs by allowing developers to produce market-rate affordable dwellings. This is a very good way to promote diversity and social stability in the city, and hopefully in our state.

The lifestyle available in smaller units frees people from the standard American involvement with possessions and provides more time for living a balanced life.

I hope San Francisco will step up in helping us build a more equitable and durable future by allowing the production of smaller units.
